Will Waddell, PhD candidate in history at The Ohio State University, thanks everyone for coming to the Military Frontiers: A Graduate Symposium at The Ohio State University. This event was co-sponsored by the College of Art and Humanities, Department of History, and Mershon Center for International Security Studies.
Robert Clemm is a Ph.D. candidate in military history at Ohio State University. He is presenting at the Military Frontiers: A Graduate Symposium at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies on Friday, May 13th. His paper was titled, "Conceptualizing Conquest: The Use of Cartography in the Creation of Colonial Eastern Africa".
Military Frontiers: A Graduate Symposium brings together leading graduate students engaged in national academic debate within military history. Over 40 people attended the 2-day event held at Saxbe Auditorium at Moritz College of Law, and the Mershon Center conference room.
John Guilmartin, professor of history at Ohio State University, asks Robert Clemm a question during the Military Frontiers: A Graduate Symposium conference.
Peter Mansoor, Raymond E. Mason Jr. Chair in Military History, follows up the first panel's presentations as the panel commentator.
Mark Grimsley, professor of history at Ohio State University, commentates on the second panel's papers and discussions on Friday, May 13, 2011.
Alan Beyerchen, professor of history at The Ohio State University, leads the discussion for the third panel of the day.
Left to right: Conference organizer, Will Waddell, keynote speaker Victor Davis Hanson, conference organizer, Sarah Douglas.
Mark Grimsley (left), panel commentator congratulates conference organizers Will Waddell (center) and Sarah Douglas (right) on a successful event.
Jon Hendrickson (left) and Robert Clemm (right) debate with the audience about the implications of the final panel's papers.