

Dean David Manderscheid (standing) of the College of Arts and Sciences introduces the Business for Peace Collaborative: Panel Discussion, on March 25, 2014, at the Mershon Center.

Attendees at the Business for Peace panel discussion gathered at a reception before the event. Shown are (left to right) Kelechi Kalu, vice provost for global strategies and international affairs; Maureen Metcalf, consultant for Office of International Affairs; and Linda Montano, director of business operations at Office of International Affairs.

Ann Fisher (standing), host of All Sides on WOSU, moderated the Business for Peace panel discussion. Panelists included (left to right) Mason Foster Ye, student in Fisher College of Business; Christopher Gelpi, Chair of Peace Studies and Conflict Resolution; Yoram Haftel, associate professor of international relations at Hebrew University; and Patrice McMahon, director of global engagement at University of Nebraska.

The program for the Business for Peace panel discussion is seen with the most recent book by Mershon affiliate Chad Alger, a nationally renowned peace scholar who had recently passed away and to whom the panel was dedicated.

Mason Foster Ye (left) begins the discussion for the Business for Peace Collaborative Panel as (left to right) Christopher F. Gelpi, Yoram Haftel and Patrice C. McMahon wait to deliver their statements. The panel was held Tuesday March 25, 2014, at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies. Photo by Jon McAllister / The Lantern