THE TWILIGHT OF THE HEART.

By H. M. RUTHERFORD.

The twilight of the heart, when a man feels that there is little, if any, of him left in this world, is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE HEART.

By H. M. RUTHERFORD.

The twilight of the heart, when a man feels that there is little, if any, of him left in this world, is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE HEART.

By H. M. RUTHERFORD.

The twilight of the heart, when a man feels that there is little, if any, of him left in this world, is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE HEART.

By H. M. RUTHERFORD.

The twilight of the heart, when a man feels that there is little, if any, of him left in this world, is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE HEART.

By H. M. RUTHERFORD.

The twilight of the heart, when a man feels that there is little, if any, of him left in this world, is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE HEART.

By H. M. RUTHERFORD.

The twilight of the heart, when a man feels that there is little, if any, of him left in this world, is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.

The twilight of the heart is a time of great suffering. A man, who has been accustomed to live for a greater purpose than his own existence, may feel that he is losing all interest in life. When he feels that his work is done and that he is, in a sense, dead, it is a time of great suffering.