NEW YEAR'S CALLS.

BY MRS. MARY C. VAUGHAN.

The door opened to my expectations. I was greeted and ushered to the drawing-room, ready for the entertainment of the season. The room was filled with gladness, with music, with a general sense of prosperity and hope. It was an hour of high spirits, a time of gay revels, a period of mirth.

I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door. It was followed by voices, by the sound of music, by the chattering of the people. I had heard the music, the voices, the sound of the door. I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door.

I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door. It was followed by voices, by the sound of music, by the chattering of the people. I had heard the music, the voices, the sound of the door. I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door.

I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door. It was followed by voices, by the sound of music, by the chattering of the people. I had heard the music, the voices, the sound of the door. I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door.

I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door. It was followed by voices, by the sound of music, by the chattering of the people. I had heard the music, the voices, the sound of the door. I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door.

I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door. It was followed by voices, by the sound of music, by the chattering of the people. I had heard the music, the voices, the sound of the door. I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door.

I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door. It was followed by voices, by the sound of music, by the chattering of the people. I had heard the music, the voices, the sound of the door. I had listened, first intently, then warily to the sound of the door.