

Jason Brownlee, Assistant Professor of Government and Middle Eastern Studies at the University of Texas, spoke April 14, 2009, on "Reconsidering Presidential Elections in the Arab World."

Jason Brownlee (standing) was the first speaker in the Mershon Center's 2009 Islam and Democracy Lecture Series. He answered questions from the audience after his talk on presidential elections in the Arab world.

Jason Brownlee (center) speaks with Bill Liddle (right), Professor of Political Science. Liddle organizes the Islam and Democracy lecture series at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies.

Jason Brownlee (right center), Assistant Professor of Government and Middle Eastern Studies at University of Texas, met with an honors undergraduate class at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies. Bill Liddle (far right), Professor of Political Science, teaches this class on Democracy in the Muslim World.

Jason Brownlee (left) leads a class discussion about alternate forms of political organization in Iran. Bill Liddle (right), Professor of Political Science at The Ohio State University, invited Brownlee to speak to his class about current research on democracy in the Muslim world.

Honors undergraduate students pose questions to Jason Brownlee about using election metrics in comparative political research.