

Nathan Brown (left), professor of political science and international affairs and director of the Institute for Middle East Studies at George Washington University, and Bill Liddle (right), professor of political science at The Ohio State University, talked before Brown's lecture at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies. Brown visited the Mershon Center on May 6, 2010 and delivered a lecture titled, "Running to Lose: The Muslim Brotherhood and Parliamentary Elections," as part of the Center's Islam and Democracy Speaker Series organized by Bill Liddle.

Nathan Brown, professor of political science and international affairs and director of the Institute for Middle East Studies at George Washington University, lectured at the Mershon Center for International Security Studies on May 6, 2010. His lecture was titled "Running to Lose: The Muslim Brotherhood and Parliamentary Elections," and was co-sponsored by Honors and Scholars, the Department of Political Science, the Middle East Studies Center, and the Mershon Center for International Security Studies.

After delivering his lecture on "Running to Lose: The Muslim Brotherhood and Parliamentary Elections," Nathan Brown (top left), professor of political science and international affairs and director of the Institute for Middle East Studies at George Washington University, met with students enrolled in the honors seminar "Democracy in Muslim Majority Countries," taught by Bill Liddle (center), professor of political science at The Ohio State University. Liddle organizes the Mershon Center's Islam and Democracy Speaker Series, of which Brown's lecture was a part.

Students enrolled in Professor Bill Liddle's honors seminar "Democracy in Muslim Majority Countries," took advantage of the opportunity to ask Nathan Brown, professor of political science and international affairs and director of the Institute for Middle East Studies at George Washington University, many interesting and engaging questions. Brown gave a lecture at the Mershon Center titled "Running to Lose: The Muslim Brotherhood and Parliamentary Elections," as part of the Islam and Democracy Speaker Series, which is organized by Bill Liddle, professor of political science at The Ohio State University. Brown's visit was co-sponsored by Honors and Scholars, the Department of Political Science, the Middle East Studies Center, and the Mershon Center for International Security Studies.