
AN OCCURENCE OF ATYPUS MILBERTI WALCK.
IN OHIO.

CARL J. DRAKE.

While working on the food of frogs at Cedar Point, Ohio this summer I found in the stomach of Rana pipiens Shreber the rare purse-web spider, Atypus milberti Walck. This is the first record of its occurrence in the Central States and the second time it has been taken north of Washington, D. C. The frog was caught August 15, about one and one-half miles southeast of the Lake Laboratory, close to Sandusky Bay.

Prof. W. M. Barrows recognized the spider as Atypus and sent it to Dr. Banks at the National Museum, who sent the following reply: "This is the Atypus milberti Walck. as you suspect, and far north for it. Last summer Emerton took one half way up the Hudson River. The high cost of living is evidently not affecting frogs, when they take such rare thing as Atypus."
